

Should You Repair Your Cell Phone or Get a New One

With increasing popularity of cell phones and wireless assistance, what happens if something goes wrong. While you might have spent a dollar or ten dollars on your cell phone at the renewal of your contract, chances are, your phone value is several hundred dollars.

According to a survey released by the Pew Internet and American Life Project, 62% of all Americans are part of a wireless, mobile population that participates in digital activities away from home or work. If you think about this the numbers are astounding.

Today everyone has and uses a cell phone or personal digital assistant and as they grow in popularity the complexity of the actual instruments grows. When cell phones broke in the 90's chances were you could fix it yourself with a small screw driver and a pair of tweezers. Today if you even remove a panel from your instrument to try to do self cell phone repair your warranty will be terminated .

The fact is, cell phones break. More children are using cell phone and undergo conditions that may be considered abusive. Most Americans are finding out that "everything" is not covered with the "insurance" they purchase from their carrier. The question is, were do you go for service.

The good news is, cell phone repair companies are opening up, mostly in metropolitan areas, which offer both a drop off and a mail repair service.

Cell phone repair service is a growing industry. Look for Cell Phone repair services to become the next large franchise opportunity.

About the Author

Jeff Gasner is with CPR - Cell Phone Repair, a cell phone repair and iPod repair service that repairs cell phones all over the country. To learn more visit <http://www.chicagocellrepair.com>.

Source: <http://www.spivo.com/articles>